THE EXHIBITION KARANGA KARANGA

This exhibition came from an idea by Ngapine Allen on having seen an exhibition called Water and Clay at the City Art Gallery. The exhibition combined the talents of a number of potters and watercolourists.

She was excited by the possibility of an exhibition in different media by Maori women. The karanga had begun.

Keri Kaa, Robyn Kahukiwa, and Irihapiti Ramsden took the idea to the then director of the City Art Gallery — Anne Philbin who supported it, as has its present director John Leuthart.

This karanga is many things, a calling out and a gathering in. And from there a journey which is a start for some and a continuation for others.

It is a call to people made public and also a karanga for all those who join us with their art, including those who have gone before and those yet to come.

The specific journey for this Exhibition has been one of a community of women working in groups to make their art. An art in which Maori women represent themselves, their own culture and concerns. An art in which we make the images, and seek to redefine ourselves through them.
